He admitted that he did not remember much about the unit. All ranks of officers were estimated by [redacted] he did not know their ranks according to the table of organization. All carbines mentioned above were 1944 Mossin Nagant carbines. For location of battalion compound, see Diagram D.

Weapons and Equipment

4. The only weapons and equipment which I ever had occasion to see were:
- My personal weapon: 7.62 mm. Model 1944 carbine.
 - Weapon for training purposes: 7.62 mm. Model 1944-1945 Degtyarev MG.
 - Weapon for training purposes: PPSH SMG /date of manufacture unknown/
 - Personal equipment: Gas mask /model and date of manufacture unknown/
Cargo pack
Entrenching shovel
Cartridge pouch (for 15-20 rounds)
 - Weapons and equipment for squads, platoons, companies, battalions and regiment were given above /See paragraphs 1-3/.
 - All of the above-mentioned weapons /See paragraphs 1-3/ were standard and were fully described in reference manuals.
5. I have never seen, heard of, or read about any new type weapons, vehicles, or equipment. I have never seen or heard of any semi-automatic rifles.
6. The carbine is a very dependable weapon. The ammunition was always in very good condition, and I never heard of ruptured cartridges, even when there was dirt in the carbine chamber. The Soviet sniper rifle (7.62 mm. carbine with sniper scope) was also a very efficient weapon and the scope maintained its zero. 25X1
7. Fifty per cent of the soldiers were good riflemen; five men out of ten were marksmen, and one or two out of ten were experts.
8. Even though the average soldier had two hours of bayonet drill per week, the Soviet soldier was not a very good bayonet fighter. The average soldier in the Soviet Army knew four or, at the most, five bayonet drills. The soldiers were trained to yell and make much noise during bayonet fighting, in order to intimidate the opponent. The fixed bayonet on the late model carbine was not a hindrance because it was collapsible.
9. The Soviets engaged wide and oblique targets with direct fire in short bursts, and deep targets with cross-fire in long bursts from emplaced machine guns. I believe that the Soviets never used indirect fire in employing emplaced machine guns. I do not believe that such fire is possible. I have no information on how the Soviets employed their machine guns on final protective lines; under conditions of poor visibility, targets were engaged according to sound.
10. The Soviet rifleman carried the following items during combat:
- Cargo pack with personal items, rations, and blanket
 - Entrenching shovel
 - Overcoat (rolled across the shoulders)
 - Seventy-five rounds of ammunition (20 rounds in the ammunition pouch, the balance in the pack)
 - Weapon (carbine, PPSH or Nagant revolver)
- The total weight of this equipment was 32 kg.

SECRET

SECRET/SECURITY INFORMATION

-12-

11. At no time was the 57 mm. artillery to be farther back than 50 m. from the infantry on the front lines.
12. I heard that the Soviet Army had special winter equipment and clothing for Arctic regions. I, however, have never worn or seen any such clothing or equipment.
13. The Soviet Army had no special preventive measures against trench foot; the usual instructions were to change the foot wrapping cloths, which were worn instead of socks, as often as practicable, and to wash and massage the feet whenever possible.
- 25X114. [redacted] I never heard of the "Voice of America". I believe that none of my fellow soldiers ever had occasion to listen to a private radio.

Unit Supply and Maintenance

15. Each soldier in the Soviet Army received the following items of clothing and equipment:
 - One uniform (for work, same as Class "A" -- issued for six months)
 - One Class "A" uniform (for parades, inspections, etc. -- issued for six months)
 - One pair of boots (issued for eight months)
 - One set of underwear (changed every 10 days, when the soldier was required to take a bath)
 - Two pairs of foot wrapping cloths, worn instead of socks (heavy cotton for winter, light cotton for summer)
 - One pair of heavy cotton gloves (issued only in winter -- exchanged in summer)
 - One winter cap, or a summer overseas cap
 - One overcoat (issued for two years)
 - Two belts (issued for two years)
 - Cargo pack
 - Canteen and cover
 - Entrenching tool
 - Ammunition pouch
 - Carbine (or other weapon)
 - Seventy-five rounds of ammunition (kept in the weapons room)

} issued for the entire period of service

All repairs on all items of clothing and equipment (except boots) had to be made by the individual soldier. All equipment and weapons were inspected daily by platoon leaders.
16. The unit of fire for my weapon was 75 rounds of ammunition. I am unable to give any additional information on this subject.
17. Companies and battalions did not have kitchens or food supply depots. In the garrison, all food was prepared by the regimental kitchen and food supplies were picked up from the division food supply depot by a regimental truck. In the field, food was prepared by battalion kitchens and food supplies were picked up from the regimental kitchen by a battalion truck. To my knowledge, the regiment kept a food supply for three to four weeks, with the exception of meat and bread, which were picked up from the division every three or four days. All food supplies were brought by regimental trucks once a month. I have no further details.
18. No supplies or repair facilities were taken out into the field in peacetime. I imagine that, in case of an emergency, all supplies would be moved by truck.

19. I have no information on limitations on expenditure of ammunition or fuel in peacetime; to my knowledge, there were no limitations in wartime.
20. I believe that all equipment [] was in daily use. 25X1
For storage facilities of [] the 45th Gds. Mecz. Regt., 25X1 see Diagram B. I never heard of any of the equipment being stored in winter or at any other time. The heavy weapons and vehicles (tanks) were parked in hangars and garages on wooden blocks, but I believe that all were ready for combat.
